This new account of the history, religion, art and economy of Late Antique Ḥimyar is aimed at an educated readership. It is based on the excavations at Ṣafār (one of the largest sites in Arabia) and includes a body of new visual materials, mostly in colour. Not an excavation report, it synthesises archaeological, epigraphic and historical sources. The book offers a new tripartite chronology for the history as well as one for the visual arts.

Catalogue study of a significant hoard find of copper artefacts, most of which derive from the Early Iron Age. It complements the archaeological evidence from Samad al-Shan, which was researched in parallel. The finds appear to have been stashed in an Umm an-Nar period tomb by robbers perhaps still in the 1st millennium BC.

Final report of excavations at Samad al-Shan and other sites in the Sultanate (1981–1991). The cemeteries in Samad are the most intensively and extensively researched objects in central Oman for the late pre-Islamic period. This work documents the artefactual finds and their contexts. It includes a new reappraisal of the history and sociology of the late pre-Islamic history and archaeology. The primary study object is the Samad Late Iron Age, but to define it, one must extract its find inventory from the preceding ones. Relative and absolute chronology attempted. Summaries in English and Arabic. Skeletal analyses carried out by Manfred Kunter. The original research documents are archived at the German Mining Museum in Bochum.

Studies presented on the Samad assemblage and the Iron Age in the South Province of Ḥaḡḡ. This is the report for the ministry excavation of the late Early Iron Age cemetery at Bawshar. The excavation records had remained unpublished for nearly 20 years. The discovery of the Late Iron Age finds at 'Amlā' and al-Baruni/Sama'il established interconnections with the late pre-Islamic sites to the north in the U.A.E. Finally, the mythical builder of the tower tombs was investigated.

Comprehensive catalogue with good documentation and analysis of the provenance and use of mostly metallic hoard artefacts based on European research models. Four regional hoard areas are defined by artefact type. The author distinguishes recoverable from non-recoverable hoards as a means of interpreting the meaning of these finds. Few hoard finds, if any, show use wear. Most are ergonomically useless as tools and weapons. The original documentation for this research is archived in the Peabody Museum, Harvard University.

Newly discovered hoard artefacts are published, mainly from the eastern part of India and Madhya Pradesh. The first large published group of modern quantitative analyses of the alloys of the artefacts provide a broad basis for a better understanding, especially of the Indian copper hoards.

Brief account of Aegean Bronze Age glyptic.
334. Early Cretan Seals and their relations with the Near East and Egypt, Studi micenei ed egeo anatolici 26, 1987b, 162–77.
The compositional schemes used by Friedrich Matz in his work ECS, are questionable in light of recent seal finds.

Several allegedly Egyptian scarabs in fact were produced on Crete and are characteristic of local work. Their value as such is often useless for the contexts in which they occurred.

341. Einige ägäische Siegel aus dem Metropolitan Museum, Kadmos 19, 1980a, 97–105.
Victor Kenna catalogued the Aegean seals of the MMA, omitting those the authenticity of which he was unsure of. The author sees no reason to question their authenticity.
342. On the date of the Hieroglyphic Deposit in Knossos, Kadmos 17, 1978a, 1–7.
The author argues for a MM IIB dating for the Hieroglyphic Deposit in Knossos by virtue of stratigraphy and seal style.
343. Platanos Tholos B in Kreta: Bemerkungen zu den Siegeln, Marburger Winckelmann-Programm, 1978b, 3–5.
A seal of Old Babylonian type found in Platanos tholos B is of little value in dating this tomb and its contents.
344. Two seals of the 'Hieroglyphic Deposit Group' from Gournia, Temple Univ.

Aegean Symposium 4, 1978c, 51–6.

Seals of the Hieroglyphic Deposit Group form a group in terms of style, subject matter and technical quality. The author attempts to date two seals by assigning them to this group.
